NATURE'S NOTEBOOK

The cat-like creature you see above attacking the Giant Tapir, lived in the long, dark ages before history began. It is a Sabretooth carnivore, or flesh eater and looks a good deal like the Sabretooth Tiger and other Sabretoothed cat prowlers of that distant past. But, it is not a cat, it is an imitation of a cat and, instead of belonging to the mammal family as do the cats, this masquerading creature belonged to a family called Marsupials. A Marsupial is a kind of animal that carries its young in a pouch and the babies are extremely tiny, particularly in comparison to the size they attain when fully grown:

Strangely enough, quite frequently, Marsupials mimic the looks of other species of animals. Indeed, the Tasmanian Wolf, which exists today, is not a wolf, it is a Marsupial and only looks like a wolf but has no relationship to the Wolf or Dog family. In the days when the Sabretooth Marsupial roamed the primeval jungle there were many Marsupials in all parts of the world. But today Marsupials are found only in Australia and on the American Continent.

The Australian Kangaroo is a Marsupial and you all know how it carries its young in a pouch and that the young, of even the big, six foot Kangaroos are only about the size of a Bee when born. The best known Marsupial, to us in America, is the Oppossum and these creatures, when gotten young, make delightful pets who can be trained to climb ropes and hang from your finger or hand by their long, bare, prehensile tail. Here again we have Marsupial mimicry, for the Oppossum looks like a huge rat, but he isn't a rat at all. Instead he is related to the Kangaroo, Wombat, Bandicoot, Cuscus, Koala (the Australian Honey Bear, another example of mimicry), Tasmanian Devil and Tasmanian Wolf. Marsupials vary in their mode of life as much as they do in their form, some living in trees, some on the ground and some underground.
